The Luck of the Owl

by Anita N. Amin

After dinner, Olivia sat at the kitchen table, staring at her pumpkin. The contest at school was tomorrow. But she still didn't know how to decorate her pumpkin. What was she going to do?

"Olivia, come and see this!" Her dad barged in, waving binoculars.

Olivia sighed. He must've seen another bird, she thought. Dad was obsessed with bird-watching. To her, a bird was just a bird.

She followed Dad to the back door.

Olivia stepped back. "What was that?" Whatever it was, it sounded mean and hungry.

Olivia scanned the spot where the screech had come from. She could make out a tree hollow with something moving in it. "An owl! But I thought owls hoot."

"Some hoot," Dad said. "Some screech. Some whistle. Some hiss... There are all kinds of owl calls."

"But aren't owls bad luck?" Olivia asked, remembering Mom's comment.

Dad paused. "Some people think owls are good luck. Others think they're bad luck."

"I hope you're right – that owls are good luck." She needed good luck for the contest.

"The contest!" An idea suddenly hit her. "That's how I'll decorate my pumpkin!"

She gathered some bark and fallen leaves. She carried them to the kitchen table.

She noticed her pumpkin was the same color as the owl's eyes. She drew two circles on the pumpkin. Then she found two black buttons and pasted one in each circle. "The eyes are done."

Next, she glued some bark above and between the eyes. "The horns and beak are done."

Finally, she glued the leaves onto her pumpkin. "The feathers are done."

She sat back and admired her owl-pumpkin. "Just one more thing..."

Holding a tape recorder, Olivia listened by the back door. After a long silence, she frowned. Had the owl flown away?

Screeeeech.

Finally! Olivia taped the screech. Now, she was ready for the contest.

Dad hugged her. "Sorry, kiddo. I know you wanted to win. I guess the owl really was bad luck."

"But," Olivia continued, proudly holding up a ribbon, "I won an honorable mention!" She reread her note from the judges: Nice use of nature.

Dad smiled. "So the owl brought you good luck."

Olivia smiled. "No, I made my own luck. But the owl did inspire me."
